Lesson from HP history... "Packard's and Hewlett's tight control of the board certainly did not seem to impede the company's growth from its founding through the 1970s. But when computers came to be driven by microprocessors and the new forces that technology unleashed, Dave and Bill were less able to call the shots. For all their talents and skills, neither Packard nor Hewlett were experienced with the technologies or business models shaping computing at that time. This is where they, as well as John Young, might have relied on the guidance of independent board directors selected for that kind of knowledge."
